Rand Services Provide Added Value

Most local contractors know that Rand Lumber Company has the market cornered on quality products; many can speak just as highly about the added value of Rand's knowledgeable services.

Recently Eliot-based Douglas A. DeGrappo Builders wrapped up construction on a 28-foot by 38-foot dormered cape (with an 18-foot by 24-foot attached master bedroom) in Kittery Point for homeowners Diane and Bill Potter. DeGrappo could have gone to any number of lumber yards located closer to the job site; instead, all of the framing, siding, trim, and roofing came from Rand Lumber.

"We've been working together for nearly 10 years," says DeGrappo, whose grandfather was also a builder. "First of all, I never go to Rand – they deliver everything to us, so it's not a matter of our having to haul everything to the job site.

"Plus, Jim Rand comes up with the specs and lumber list for all of my plans. He knows how I build, and we basically work backwards together from there. As a result I don't really have to bid things out because the prices come in where I think they will. This saves me office time and eliminates the chance that I'll make mistakes."

Just as importantly, the quality of lumber is "great," says DeGrappo, who readily admits that he is "somewhat picky" as a customer. "Mark (McPherson) always does an excellent job picking through the lumber. They already carry the higher quality studs and wood with fewer knots, but they always do a good job culling through the pieces and giving me the quality they know I want."

All together, these types of services demonstrate the difference between Rand Lumber and other companies.

Featuring a striking arched front portico, the Potter home uses clear cedar clapboards and primed pine trim provided by Rand Lumber.
