Newmarket Project Reflects Strength of Family Ties

The four-inch by six-inch exposed beams with collar ties used in the connector section were custom-milled for the Walker home.

The Walker Family Homestead has been located on Wadleigh Falls Road in Newmarket for several generations. When it came time for son Dave Walker and his family to build a new home on the property, Rye builder Brian Moore helped to work out a unique solution to a common zoning rule that restricts the number of individual buildings on a single property: Simply add on to the existing home.

After four months spent watching the project take shape, the Walker family is enjoying a new, three-bedroom ranch home that Moore built as an addition off the existing house. Their next-door neighbor – the family patriarch, Richman Walker – is right next door, through a mudroom-like nine-foot by 18-foot connector building.

“Keeping it in the family” is something that also sets the Rand Lumber Company apart. Moore, who has been purchasing materials from Rand for more than 20 years, says he deals with the lumber yard because it is locally owned and operated. “I’ve known Jim, Ken, and Kathy for a long time, and it’s nice to know that you’re working with the owners of the company,” he says.

He adds that Rand’s “bread and butter” is pine and oak boards, which he happened to use throughout the Walker house. In fact, Rand supplied all of the framing materials and trim boards; the lumber and WeatherBest® synthetic decking used on the front porch; and even the metal roof that the Walkers chose for minimal maintenance.

The most important reason Moore relies on building materials from Rand, he says, “is that the quality is excellent. It really separates them from the competition. When you go to some of the box stores, you just can’t find pieces that are straight; but Rand always has a good supply on hand because they mill it all right there. They’ll do custom jobs, too, and that’s not available at most lumber yards.”

Like strong New England families, Rand Lumber’s commitment to quality and service continues to endure.

The original building was an open garage used by the town to park its trucks. The Walker family enclosed it in the 1970s for use as a home; today the single-story ranch addition brings another Walker generation close by.
