Rand Lumber Takes to the Ocean

It's not often that our lumber makes it onto the ocean – but a local Rye carpenter is preparing for just that with a 16-foot Grand Banks Dory being built from scratch. Every bit of the all-purpose vessel includes pine, oak and other materials from Rand Lumber.

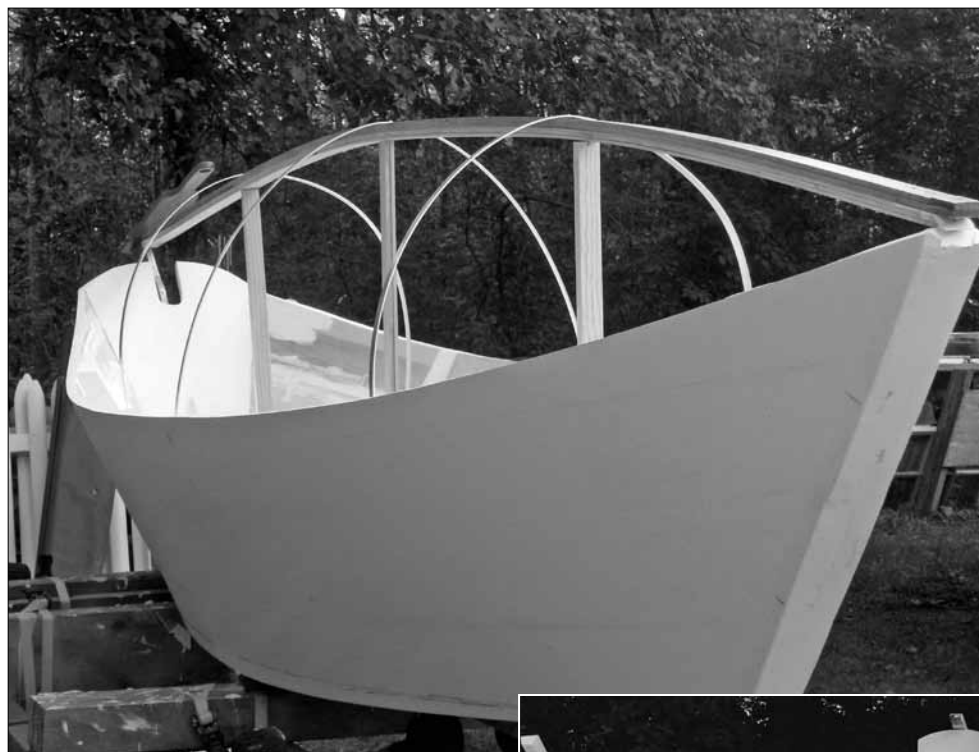

Traditionally used as fishing boats on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, the “Banks” dory is a small, open, narrow, flat-bottomed and slab-sided boat with a particularly narrow transom. The long overhangs at the bow and stern helps lift the dory over waves and stabilize in rough weather.

The Rye dory has been designed to take on two sets of oars, although a nine-foot sail is also being custom-made and plans include installing a small motor.

Our three-quarter-inch by 10-inch pine is used on the sideboards and our six-quarter boards on the transom. Three oak strips that run laterally along the hull will allow the dory to be brought up on the rocks without fear of dinging or damaging. The inside frame is also oak.

The dory will be painted off-blue on the topside, and the bottom will be painted red, extending across the keel. The inside will be the traditional Grand Banks Dory cream color. A stunning black cherry board, salvaged from a local cabinetry job, will be installed on the bow.

To date the sideboards have been cut and are being joined to the frame with marine adhesive. Three seats will be inserted between the boards.

The rudder, crafted from oak and coated with urethane, has a clever pintel and gudgeon hinging system that allows it to be kicked up while navigating through rocky shores. The pintel is a one-half-inch diameter pin, rounded at the head to match with the gudgeon and secured with retaining clips that attach to the rudder blade.

Top: The 16-foot Grand Banks Dory is perfectly suited for the ocean. Bottom: Three-quarter by 10-inch pine sideboards will be joined to the frame with marine 5200 adhesive sealant.

Middle: Inside frames are hand-crafted from oak.

A cut-out in the six-quarter oak accommodates the rudder.

The name of the boat will be Solution – a way of acknowledging that there’s always a way to solve a problem, or that getting out on the ocean is like a “solution” to getting away from the everyday ups and downs that we all experience.

“Solution” will be trailered and kept close to shore, with its owner mainly putting in at Rye Harbor’s Odiorne launch and sailing up to Little Harbor and back. The anticipated launch date is Labor Day, 2011.
