Building a classic barn for a fine collection

Adrian Fieldhouse has spent his career building high-quality sailboats and creating finely-crafted additions and renovations for discriminating clients. This 2800 square foot barn in Newfields, NH, built to house a collection of fine cars, is his latest project for his company, Yard Arm Construction.

Working closely with the homeowner for 5 months to design the barn, excavation and construction began 4 months ago, and is expected to be completed within the next month by his crew of three builders.

One of Adrian's greatest challenges on this project was fitting the new structure into the picturesque, rolling country landscape without it feeling too large or too commercial. This was accomplished by the variety of roof lines and the variety of exterior materials used. The side "addition" (shown in the photo on the right) will house the owner's boat, while the main barn will house the cars. The addition was finished using Rand's rough pine, while the main building used traditional shingles. Both materials will be finished with an oil-based exterior stain.

The interior of both areas, as well as an upstairs workspace, is being finished in Rand's shiplap and knotty pine, which will be finished with a water-based clear polyurethane to showcase the natural character of the wood. The floor of the second story workshop will be fir.

Yard Arm used Rand's pine almost exclusively in this project, including making the barn doors and window frames from pine. A metal roof, side dormer and back deck accent the authentic New England barn.

Adrian's next project at this property will be a similar style two-car garage, which will be started this coming spring.
