All for the Love of an Old Barn

John Boisvert of Stratham believes if one owns an old home or barn, they have a responsibility to maintain both the structure and the beauty of the building.

John and his young family moved into their new home in Stratham about a year and a half ago. This would be a new home for the family, but in a very old house. The historic farmhouse and barn was in the Wiggin family for nine generations, being one of the oldest farms in New England.

Built in 1740, the house needed some renovations. John hired Master Enterprises North to complete the work on the house. He opted to work on the barn himself.

A civil engineer by trade, with two young girls at home, John had less time than expected. When at a stopping point, Master Enterprises North made John an offer he couldn't refuse to complete the barn project.

John had already done his shopping and cost comparisons for the materials for the barn project. Rand's rough-sawn shiplap was the product of choice for the exterior. The barn renovations included a new roof, a good amount of new framing, new barnboard and new windows. Consolidating the efforts to the barn meant demolishing some buildings that were beyond repair and without future use. John assisted in the less-than-glamorous details of the project including demolition of the attached sheds and repair of the foundation. John credits Rand for two particular products that fit the project's needs and budget perfectly: The BCI 900 I-beams used in the garage were very reasonably priced, and the barn door hardware selected was an exact match for what John had in mind, again at a reasonable price.

When asked what John will do now that the barn is complete, he tells of a few interior home projects that will also involve Rand products, such as a tongue and groove ceiling for the porch.

For now, John has no short-term plan for the beautifully restored barn; although his two girls, ages 4 and 16 months have dreams of horses someday in the future.
